| [note 9]    | National Park status confers a higher status of protection in relation to landscape and scenic beauty than Green Belt. The conservation of the natural beauty of the landscape and countryside should be given weight in planning decisions in these areas. Therefore figures for 2006 and 2007 are not directly comparable with those for earlier years.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |

| [note 13]   | The extent of the protected areas is based on the following site designations: Areas of Special Scientific Interest (Northern Ireland), Sites of Special Scientific Interest (England, Scotland and Wales), National Nature Reserves, Marine Conservation Zones, Nature Conservation Marine Protected Areas, Ramsar Sites, Special Areas of Conservation (including candidate Special Areas of Conservation and Sites of Community Importance), Special Protection Areas, Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty (also known as National Landscapes), National Scenic Areas, National Parks. Source: Joint Nature Conservation Committee, Natural England, Natural Resources Wales, Northern Ireland Environment Agency, NatureScot. As the names of some of these designations suggest, not all of them include land within England. |
